"How do I start?"

A Quiet Time in 140 characters. It is December 2009. A beautiful blue sky is spread over the rice fields – the harvest has just been gathered in. In northeast Thailand, church planter Marten Vise sat thinking about how he should organize his quiet time. He decided to choose one verse out of the Bible chapter he was reading, and to use Twitter to say something short about it – using, at most, 140 characters, which was the standard at the time. In just a short period, he had thousands of followers and the idea came to use the internet to reach people. The name GlobalRize was born: Global, worldwide and Rize, due to the association with the rice fields and rising to a new life.

Millions are reached. When Marten returned to the Netherlands he involved more people in this mission. He worked from an office in his home and even though there were plenty of rooms, it quickly became very cramped. The work moved to an office space and soon a growing team was exploring new possibilities to spread the Gospel. Today, GlobalRize spreads the Gospel using the internet and every month millions of people are reached, coming from multiple corners of the Globe. GlobalRize reaches large numbers through social media, adds depth and substance through websites and offers personal contact through e-courses. As a mission in the internet era, GlobalRize also offers unique opportunities for people to use their gifts and experiences in media in a volunteer role.

How do I start? Maybe it starts with a quiet time & tweet.
